Security Printing

MICR characters are printed on documents in either of the MICR fonts. The ink used in the printing is magnetizable (commonly known as magnetic) ink or toner, usually containing iron oxide. The document is passed through a MICR reader. The ink is first magnetized. Then the characters are passed over a MICR reader head, a device similar to the playback head of a tape recorder. As each character passes over the head it produces a unique waveform that can be easily identified by the system. The use of MICR allows the characters to be read reliably even if they have been overprinted or obscured by other marks, such as cancellation stamps and signature.
